

“People with learning disabilities can do marvellous things. We just need to be given a chance”

[Catherine Carter, Project Worker: CHANGE]

Wouldn't it be better if people with learning disabilities were employed to work in the services they use?

Wouldn't it shake up the power in these services?

Wouldn't it help more people with learning disabilities get employment?

But how to do it?

The Learning by Doing Together project was a community-university partnership that was funded by DRILL and brought together CHANGE, The University of Leeds and KeyRing.

These groups joined together to make a new peer worker job with the strengths of people with learning disabilities in mind.

You are invited to the final event of the Learning by Doing Together project.

This event is for people with learning disabilities, academics, policy makers and organisations to learn from our project and from each other.

We will talk about our new way of thinking about learning disability and employment.

We will give you a preview of our toolkit. Our toolkit is about:

- how to design a job;

- how we use peer support;

- how we find and choose staff in an inclusive way.

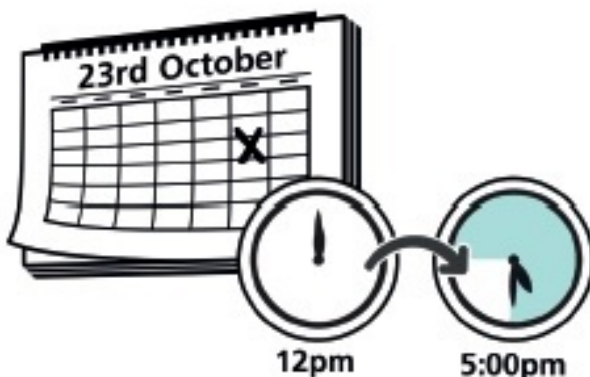

We will be doing some activities to help us talk about our ideas and to hear about what you think.

We will invite you to join in with group activities, drama and discussion as much or as little as you like.

We aim to make our event accessible so please let us know how we can best support you.
